WELCOME

To All You Fans of New American Playwriting,

Welcome to the 2021 Pacific Playwrights Festival!

After having been forced by the coronavirus scourge to cancel the 2020 festival, we're thrilled to be able to pick up where we left off two years ago—albeit with a festival that looks quite different from the first 22 iterations. This year, we offer five staged readings of new American plays, each of which has undergone at least four days of rehearsal prior to being presented on one of SCR's stages and professionally filmed using a three-camera set-up. It may not quite be a live theatre event shared among several hundred friends and colleagues, but it's as close as we can get under the present circumstances—and we hope you'll find it a refreshing change from the typical Zoom play-readings we've all gotten used to over the past year.

The 2021 festival includes a folk-horror tale set in the American South of the 1930s, a road-trip across the U.S. in the company of a Korean American family, a story of an Iranian refugee trying to make a new home in London, an encounter between two women—one Canadian, one Mexican—who have more in common than they might expect (and less than they might hope for) and a musical about a 60-year Hollywood romance between two people you may never have heard of but who made important contributions to a lot of movies you've probably seen. It's a thrilling and multifaceted lineup of plays, with both homegrown and international stories, reflecting South Coast Repertory's commitment to celebrating our community and the world around us in all their multiplicity.

So we invite you to sit back—wherever you find yourselves this spring—and enjoy these five examples of American playwriting at its best!
